passenger accommodation. The Chinese, who can stand a vast deal of heat, will not take passage in the vessels between decks, and hence the spar decks have been constructed to accommodate them—the rules and regulations of the British transport service, do not allow the poor soldier to be accommodated in the spar deck, but require space in the between decks only—so that the spar deck, which on other vessels is the most desirable place for a steamer passenger, is totally rejected by the British naval and military authorities for transport purposes.

Upon the announcement of the invitation to tender for the conveyance of the 20th Regiment to Japan, some few weeks since, the steamers were offered, both having spar deck accommodation, and between decks as well. These vessels together could easily have taken the 20th to Japan in a week, but the area of the spar deck accommodation being deemed by the naval authorities not available, the between deck area was rejected; and it has been accepted the wing of the 20th Regiment now in Kowloon, would have been in Yokohama long ago.

It seems to us that the alternative of leaving the men at this unhealthy season of the year in such exposed and inefficient quarters as those at Kowloon, should have been weighed against the alternative of sending them to the shelter of spar decks. What is the result? Why about one hundred of the men have since been struck down with fever, and many more must yet suffer as the arrangements for embarkation shall be completed. On the other hand, the men who have been sent to Japan, are now in the two steamers with spar decks, the tenders for which were rejected; there would scarcely have been a sick man on the passage.

It appears to us that an executive officer is wanted in all cases of this kind. For instance, if General Brown and Captain Nolo were by the regulations, constituted commissioners with full powers to do as they might please. They could nominate an executive officer with full powers to do as they might please. They could nominate an executive officer with full powers to do as they might please.
